

New book announcement

Dear colleagues:

Knowledge Cultivation: Promoting Research to Enrich Everyday Practice is a new book by Scott Tunison (at the University of Saskatchewan) that addresses the gap between the promise of improved practice through the implementation of research findings and what we do every day. The book examines the challenges we face as we encourage research use in the field, describes in detail the model developed and implemented by the author to mobilise data in a public school district, and evidence of efficacy of the model. Knowledge Cultivation, as described in this book, is an innovative approach to fostering wide practitioner engagement with research that any educational organisation could implement successfully.

The book is now available direct from Sense Publishers as well as Amazon and Borders. Please consider:

1. Encouraging grad students and colleagues to review the book for journals.
2. Including the book as a resource for courses you teach. It is particularly useful for leadership preparation courses, principal and superintendent certification programs, and research use topics.
3. Sharing details of the book with your own professional networks.
